Notes: A staunch member of the Invictus. He had been a knight in the service of Baldwin II of Flanders during the restoration of the western empire; in death, the First Estate brought him quickly (for the Invictus) into the Order of the Thorned Wreath. In that role, he continued as a knight up through the First Crusade. At the bidding of the Lancea et Sanctum, elements of the Thorned Wreath rode with the Crusaders into Persia. There he foreswore the Invictus, the Sanctified, and God himself, and dedicated himself to something called Belial. In that service, he slew Crusaders and Turkish soldiers (and Kindred) alike. d'Argent disappeared shortly after the Crusaders took Jerusalem; only to reappear a century and a half later at the onset of the Second Crusade. Once again, d'Argent took to the field; astride an undead charger, he swept foes of all stripes before him like wind through straw. Just prior to the fall of Jerusalem, the Turkish Kindred met under flag of truce with the Commander of the Thorned Wreath, and it was agreed: the Turks would help against this demon-pledged monster and the Knights would withdraw their support for the Crusaders in the city. It cost half their number, but they brought d'Argent to the ground with a lance through his chest.

d'Argent slumbered under watch at a number of Thorned Wreath strongholds until the turn of the 20th Century; with war again looking likely in Europe, they transferred him to the Prison.
